THE FINANCES OF INDIA

From the Budget statement made towards the close of Parliament, it appeared that in the closed accounts of 1883-4 the expenditure was given at £70,340,300, and the actual revenue was £71,727,000, showing a surplus of £1,387,000. The revised Estimates of 1884-5 gave the expenditure at £70,702,000, while the actual revenue was £69,992,000, thus creating a deficit of £710,000. The chief cause of the deficiency was due to general depression of trade, which caused a falling off in the customs and railway receipts. Furthermore, the Budget Estimates of 1885-6 presented by Sir A. Colvin, in the early part of the year, placed the estimated revenue of the period at £72,090,000, and the expenditure at £71,582,000, a surplus of £508,000. Owing, however, to the Russ an scare and the additional money spentupon the construction of a temporary line from Quetta up the Bolan Pass, this was altogether falsified, and created a deficit amounting, in round figures, to £3.780,000. In addition to this, a failure in the opium revenue to the extent of £600,000, a discount charge of £500,000, and the cost of a telegraph-wire to the Persian Gulf, together increased the deficit to the extent of £4,950,000. To this it was necessary to add other permanent forms of expenditure—as that of creating a reserve for the Indian Army, adding 26,700 men to it when in the field; reorganising the cavalry, raising two new regiments in Bengal, and arming the Indian Army with the Martini-Henry rifle. An additional sum was also needed for torpedo-boats and coast defences, fortifications and railway extensions; so that, on the whole, an additional charge of close upon two millions annually is thrown on the resources of the country. The actual deficiency of the year was met by a loan of £2,225,000, and by drawing on the balances of the Famine Fund; which left a million and a half standing over to be provided for in 1886.
